INTRODUCTION

Choosing a profession is an important stage in everyone's life. This process is related not only to personal interests and abilities, but also to social and economic conditions. Each student should consider many factors when choosing a future career. In the process of choosing a career, first of all, it is important to determine your interests. What industries do you enjoy working in? In which professions are your skills best demonstrated? Finding answers to these questions is one of the main stages of the career selection process. By choosing a career that matches their interests and abilities, students can be more satisfied with their jobs in the future. It is also necessary to take into account the demands of society when choosing a profession. Nowadays, some industries are more in demand than others. For example, fields such as IT, engineering, medicine and ecology are in high demand in modern society. Along with their interests, students should also consider the possibilities of finding a job in the future. The role of parents and teachers is also important in the process of choosing a profession. Parents should inform, interest and support their children about various professions. Teachers should help students to identify their abilities and choose a profession. Through networking, mentoring, and referrals to various career fairs, students can get help finding their way. In addition, practical experience is also important in choosing a career. Students should participate in internships to learn and gain experience in various professions. This will help them deepen their interests and make the right decision in the process of choosing a future career. The process of choosing a profession is an important and responsible task for every person. Choosing the right career, taking into account one's interests, abilities and society's requirements, is necessary for a successful and happy life in the future. By supporting students in this process, families, communities, and teachers can greatly contribute to their future success.[5]

Life skills ensure that students are prepared for situations they encounter in everyday life. These skills include communication, problem solving, time management, teamwork and self-management. As students learn life skills, they gain confidence, develop their skills, and identify strategies for future success. Various activities are organized in secondary schools to develop life skills. For example, through group work, discussions, projects, and practical exercises, students develop the skills of expressing their opinions, communicating with others, and working as a team. Such activities also improve students' social skills. Career skills help students choose careers that match their interests and abilities. Students of the 9th grade should consider many factors in the process of choosing a profession. These factors include personal interests, social demands, economic conditions, and future changes in the labor market. Students can use various tests and questionnaires to introduce themselves and determine their abilities in the process of choosing a profession.[1]

Such tools help students identify careers that match their abilities and interests. Also, students can develop their career choice skills by gathering information about careers they are interested in, getting advice from professionals, and doing internships. Various activities are held in secondary schools to develop the skills of choosing a profession in students. For example, seminars, lectures and meetings on career choice are organized. Such events allow students to learn about different professions, explain the advantages and disadvantages of each of them. It is also useful to conduct career exhibitions and excursions for students. During such events, students will have the opportunity to see different professions with their own eyes and get acquainted with their work process. Such hands-on experiences are important when choosing careers that match students' interests and abilities.[2]

The role of family and society is also important in the development of life and career choice skills of students. The family should help students identify their talents and choose a career. Parents should support and advise their children in the process of choosing a career and inform them about careers that match their interests and abilities. Society can implement various programs and projects to help students choose a career. For example, vocational colleges and training centers can develop special programs to help students choose a career. Such programs help students choose the right path in the process of choosing a career.[4]

CONCLUSION

Life and career choice skills of 9th grade students of general education school are important for their future success. By developing life skills, students can successfully conduct themselves in everyday life. Career skills also help students choose careers that match their interests and abilities. Family and community support to students plays an important role in developing life and career skills. This kind of support has a huge impact on the future success of students. Therefore, it is necessary for secondary schools, family and society to work together to develop students' life and career skills.
